How have American Christians responded to the rise in racist and violent attacks on Asian Americans during the Covid-19 pandemic? Although the forms of condemnation and calls to action have varied widely, Christian responses to anti-Asian racism have had one thing in common: they have often been led by Asian Americans in American Christian communities, especially in evangelical communities. This talk explores the contemporary anti-racism work of Asian American evangelicals. Moreover, it shows how current anti-racism work is part of a broader history of Asian American evangelical activism around racism. In contrast to the stereotype of Asian Americans as quiet and apolitical, the examples highlighted in this talk tell a starkly different story: of Asian American Christians who, emboldened by their faith, have been vocal in their call for racial justice.
